Excerpt: . . . their chiefs death. made such a desperate attack, and in such numbers, that we were compelled to run to the hatchway, to make good our retreat from their fury. Bit our cruel enemies pursued us; and now resistance was of no avail whatever against the heartless assassins who had attacked us; In this dreadful dilemma, we solicited quarter, which was granted to us, not from a principle of mercy, to which their inhuman hearts are callous, but from a hope of gaining a good booty by ransacking the vessel, a desire to increase the misery of the surviving wretches, and by disposing of us as slaves to enrich themselves. When quarter was thus granted us, we were commanded to come on deck, and, no sooner had we done so, than the monsters tied our arms behind our backs, and in this manner we were dismissed. However, no sooner had this been done, than we heard a great confusion and noise among the corsairs, which we afterwards found was occasioned by the plunging violently of the galley against our vessel. As it appeared afterwards, when the galley first boarded our ship, they had started a plank forward, and injured her bows most materially in other respects. However, they had found means to stop the leaks, and soon freed her by having set to at the pumps. And now the corsairs, having secured all their prisoners and divided them, it was my lot and that of...
